The program's default Import settings for images are set to read the IPTC attributes (TIFF, IPTC, Comments, Color Space, etc.) It's an odd look for a modern camera to leave the camera details in an XML file instead of something that more closely resembles settings used in the camera, which helps the image editor understand the settings. Adobe quickly replaced all of the dozens of font applications available for OS X with one integrated font application, accessible through a single menu item. A series of filters and tools enable you to adjust shading, social media links, and other design-related features on a photograph. Lightroom enhancements are always welcome, and I am especially glad to see Adobe add support for multiple perspectives. Understanding that a picture doesn't reflect reality, it can bring about all sorts of opportunities. Indeed, the whole purpose of a mosaic is to make a scene come alive. This same concept applies to photographs. To make something such as a large group photograph of a crowd come alive, you need many photographs of overlapping parts, taken from different perspectives. Adobe enhances the traditional Lightroom collection view for creating such a mosaic, which is useful for those of us who try to focus on the people in a photograph. I'm not using Lightroom for working on large-file projects, but I stopped working on comps with up to 10 GB of files and switched to trying to only work on projects with reasonable sized catalogs. Thankfully, I never finished CPU Requirements with Lightroom 5 in this workload, which was achieved in 4.3 Update 4. It varies a little bit from 256GB to 256 RAM when I import images. Lightroom 5 now recommends 512 GB of RAM, and when I use it, it used a lot more than that. The Import performance of single images in Lightroom 5 is very good. It's at least as quick as LR 3.2's import performance on the Mac, which is the fastest of the three mentioned compressor-based software for this type of work. This performance is about equal to the Import performance in LR 4 on the PC. It is also considerably faster than LR 4's performance on the Mac. Photoshop's Import performance is pretty much the same across platforms. Lightroom 5 was indeed slower than Lightroom 4 when it came to Importing images with average settings. It was more noticeable when the images I was importing were underexposed. This is because the dark sections of the images are located near the edges of the RAW file, and all of this data is processed simultaneously. Processing the dark areas is slower than the rest of the image. A dark image imports much faster than a normal image if it's imported with the default settings, and white balance is the default setting for import.
