There are some things that are different about the hybrid device. One major omission is a close-up viewfinder. Many of us pros do sketch on the computer first, and only then move to the iPad version. Before recently, the app allowed for only 1GB of internal storage, and to store up to 10,000 layers. Photoshop Touch 4.5 goes well beyond that and allows for up to 200,000 layers. Finally, the image previews you see in the Photos app and other apps are really sharp and detailed. Coming at the time that Tetris launched on iOS, and the months before that, many Photoshop users had been clamoring for load times to be cut. So far, so good. I don't have the same results as seen in Lightroom (see below), but I do feel that operations are faster. Not as much so as in Moonbird for example. But, when compared to Lightroom, Lightroom 5.3 definitely feels faster. Yet, image size in the same comparison is still growing. So, it's not all that much faster. I can only assume that Lightroom 5.3 is trying to take on Adobe Bridge when Lightroom is clearly more robust than Bridge. Lightroom is never more than a step or two behind Bridge, even with the introduction of the latest update. It catches up every time. One reason is that Bridge was made in single threaded fashion, whereas Lightroom is multi-threaded. Hence, Lightroom can afford to process large volumes of images in parallel, whereas many users of Bridge will experience that in a loading screen. Trying to learn Bridge from Lightroom is not easy. Bridge is much easier to use to learn from. A new user may not even realize they are in Bridge, which is not good.
